While other disciplines like physics have an inherent structure of referencing to cite the ideas of others, the disciplines like psychology which is an open ended concept oriented discipline and epistemology and philosophy which is a discipline as it is needed to discuss and understand the concepts and theories are more prone to error in the referencing. Referencing is the process of the documentation of the sources from where we have borrowed the ideas and theory to explain something. For example, if we explain something in a study it is required to note the page number from the book, reference to the chapter or in case of journal articles it is the journal name and the page number on which that article is published. Although this process of documentation is not that much complicated but it is required to be followed. For example, one can not say 'I have explained this concept in reference to the book "This is my reference". Therefore, it is a great idea to make the students aware of the importance of referencing of the study. Also, it is an excellent idea to make the students aware of the sources of the citations and the reference from which we have adopted the ideas for the discussion in our study. 2. Materials and Methods

The method in which the study was conducted is really essential. While many students omit this part of the 82157476af
